and the house church movement belong in this category too.

- Certain Protestant denominations do not practise Baptism sacramentally, including the Quakers and the Shakers.[1] These denominations view Baptism as part of a process on ongoing renewal. Antecedents of these beliefs may be found in Strigolniki theology. Normatively, the Salvation Army do not practise Baptism.

There are many independent, non-aligned or non-denominational trinitarian congregations that may take any one of these or no particular position on Baptism.

Some religious movements, such as Restorationists, Nontrinitarian movements, or the New Religious Movements, which share certain characteristics of the Protestant churches, are termed 'Protestant' by outsiders, even though neither mainstream Trinitarian Christians, nor the groups themselves, would consider the designation appropriate.
